Reflective Lesson 2nd Meeting Prose and Language Pedagogy

In the second meeting, I learned more about prose and its types, especially fiction and non-fiction. Before learning this topic, I only understood prose as a form of writing, but now I know that fiction is based on imagination, while non-fiction is based on real facts and events. I also learned that prose can be used not only for entertainment but also for learning language, developing critical thinking, and understanding different values.

What I found interesting is that prose can also be connected with local wisdom and Islamic values. Through stories, students can learn values such as patience, honesty, friendship, and perseverance. I realized that learning prose is not only about understanding a story, but also about understanding the message and values behind it. As a future English teacher, I think prose can be an interesting way to help students improve their language skills while also building their character.
